RCAF commander hosts future leaders of Canada at 8 Wing Trenton

RCAF Commander Lieutenant-General Al Meinzinger shares a glimpse of the future of the Air Force with RMC students during a professional development day at 8 Wing Trenton on March 30.

By Makala Chapman

A visit to Canada's largest air base is one of the ways the Royal Military College of Canada (RMCC) is preparing its students as future leaders. More than 400 students, also known as officer cadets, made the trek from their Kingston and St. Jean, QC. campuses to spend the day with the Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF) on March 30. The annual visit, known as the Environmental Command Professional Development Weekend, is also one of the

RCAF leads Canadian Armed Forces space initiatives

By Sarah Pacey

Space is an important and growing element of the global security environment, and space-based capabilities are crucial to the day-to-day activities of all Canadians. The Canadian Armed Forces' space-related activities are an essential component of the defence of Canada and North America, and provide support to operations worldwide. The CAF employs space-based capabilities for a range of activities including all-domain awareness, weather information, surveillance, intelligence gathering and reconnaissance, search and rescue, navigation, and global communications. The Royal Canadian Air Force has been involved in space since the 1960s. In 2013, a giant leap into the future was taken with the launch of Canada's first military satellite, Sapphire. Members of the RCAF's 21 Aerospace Control and Warning Squadron, based at 22 Wing North Bay, Ontario, began staffing the Sensor System Operations Centre, tracking, identifying and cataloguing objects in space, including satellites and debris, within a range of 5,500 to 55,000 kilometres from Earth. Sapphire and the controllers operating it, has contributed millions of observations to the US Space Surveillance Network. In 2016, the RCAF took over functional authority for Joint Space within the CAF, and this new domain leadership responsibility has marked the beginning of an exciting new chapter for space in the CAF. The RCAF is proud to count among its number two members who are current astronauts: Colonel Jeremy Hansen and Lieutenant-Colonel Joshua Kutryk, both seconded to the Canadian Space Agency. Colonel (retired) Chris Hadfield, the first Canadian astronaut to walk in space and the first Canadian commander of the International Space Station, is a former RCAF member. As a joint capability, space involves CAF members in the Navy, Army and Air Force, and their civilian defence team counterparts, all working together with other government department members to deliver capabilities that provide strategic advantage and responsiveness when integrated with sea-, land- or air-based systems. Integrated through the Canadian Space Operations Centre (CANSpOC) in Ottawa, Ontario, with support from the Sensor System Operations Centre and collaboration with allies (including via NORAD agreements), the CAF monitors satellite movements in space, and missile and space launches. From its 24/7 watch centre, the CANSpOC monitors space debris and inactive satellites, and supports CAF members deployed on operations with information such as GPS accuracy, or when global communications satellites may be limited in certain regions due to space weather. Working with allies is also a core component of the defence joint space program. Space capabilities are subject to the characteristics of the rapidly evolving space domain which is increasingly congested, contested and competitive. By working closely with allies, the CAF is not only seeking ways to reduce duplication and leverage partner capabilities, but is also working to enhance the resiliency and redundancy of these capabilities to ensure that the we will have continued and uninterrupted access to critical space enablers for operations at home and abroad. Canada's defence policy commits increased and predictable funding to the defence space enterprise over the next 20 years to deliver important new capabilities for the CAF for earth observation, space situational awareness, and satellite communications. The policy promotes space-related research and development, and partnerships with academia and industry, to advance national innovation and our mission.

Sarah Pacey is the deputy director space strategy and plans with Director General Space.

Out with the Bad Air In With the Good Air

Indoor air pollution is a serious concern in today's workplaces. Buildings have been constructed airtight to conserve energy. But this often results in poor ventilation, allowing pollutants to accumulate indoors.

Poor indoor air quality has been related to a variety of symptoms such as:

- a nagging cough
- persistent headache
- mysterious rashes
- difficulty concentrating
- frequent illnesses, allergies and others.

Many times the causes and the symptoms of indoor air quality problems are vague. In other cases there are definite links between specific illnesses and certain biological or chemical pollutants.

These are some common sources of indoor air pollution:

- By-products of fuel combustion such as carbon monoxide. This can be emitted by a poorly vented heating system, or it can come in from a parking garage or loading area, for example.
- Chemical emissions from building materials and furniture. One example is formaldehyde, which can be found in many types of building materials and furnishings. Another example is vapours from solvents.
- Biological pollutants. These can be fungi, molds, bacteria or viruses, and may be found in environment such as air conditioners and damp soil. They can cause diseases and allergic reactions.
- Tobacco smoke. This is a common building pollutant. It can be circulated through ventilation systems from designated smoking areas to "smoke free" regions of the building.
- Perfumes. These can include personal care products, which contribute to an overall accumulation in the air and even cause allergic reactions in some people.

- Dusts. These can be related to poor indoor house-keeping, to a source of pollution outside or to a process carried out in the building.

What can you do to ensure good indoor air quality? Here are some ideas:

- Get acquainted with your building's ventilation system. Whose responsibility is it to make sure it is maintained in good repair and kept clean and free of pollutants? Learn where the air intakes are located.
- Learn about the various causes and symptoms of indoor air problems.

- When rearranging work areas, consider the design of the ventilation system. Make sure you do not block air duct outlets with equipment or furniture. Keep chemicals such as solvents covered to prevent the escape of vapours.

- Choose less harmful chemicals. Make sure any designated smoking areas are vented to the outdoors.
- Ensure the area is kept clean, to prevent the build-up of dust, fungus spores and other pollutants.

We all know that outdoor air pollution is a serious problem, but indoor air problems can also affect your health and safety.

first opportunities for most students to see a fully-operational military base in action. Beginning with a warm welcome from 8 Wing commander Colonel Mark Goulden, the students were then greeted by the RCAF's commander Lieutenant-General (Lt.-Gen.) Al Meinzinger. In his speech, he thanked them for their attendance and noted that he was confident that the future of the military was in good hands. "This is a really important day," he said. "It's an important engagement in the context of your training, professional development and education. We are nothing without the youth of the organization and you're going to have such a profound impact as you move on in your careers." He went on to share that while they were at an air base, it was also important to remember that the RCAF's capabilities were just one part of a whole when it came to mission success. Reflecting on the future of the air force, Lt.-Gen. Meinzinger said it was an especially exciting time to be a part of the RCAF as there were a number of upcoming projects. Some of these initiatives include the potential for new advanced fighter jets, remote piloted air vehicles, new fixed-wing search and rescue aircraft and updates to the CH-146 Griffon and the CH-149 Cormorant helicopter fleet. "Our government has told us that they want us to be out and about, whether that's domestically, continentally or internationally, in a much bigger way than we have been in the past," he said. "For me, as a commander, I recognize that the Air Force is going to be a key part of that and we're going to need to grow in a number of ways. This is why we have invested heavily in today."

The students were then treated to several static displays of RCAF aircraft including the CH-148 Cyclone, CT-114 Tutor and the CH-130 Hercules. Taking the chance to snap pictures of he and his classmates posing by the various aircraft was natural sciences student officer cadet Gabriel Gagnon-Cady. He noted he was especially excited to visit 8 Wing Trenton as he had never visited before. "Experiencing this firsthand is a lot of fun," he said. "It's nice to experience what people like pilots are experiencing each day and overall there's lots to learn about life on a base." As for his future plans, he said he hopes to work as an aerospace engineer and develop new technologies for the military. "The military has a lot of great opportunities and the benefits are countless," he said. "I'm looking forward to what's next in my career." Also on hand to speak to how pleased he was with how things were going was the event coordinator Major (Maj.) Glen Smith. He noted it was crucial to have the students visit an operational base so that they would have a better understanding of the expectations and responsibilities that will be placed upon them once they were finish their schooling. "Staging this event at 8 Wing is a no-brainer as it's the jewel of the Air Force," he said. "To bring our students and future leaders here and get to show them the great facilities, the inventory of aircraft we have and to meet the aircrew that are working on and operating them is a fantastic opportunity." Maj. Smith reiterated that the students visiting were assets and was confident that they would serve well in their role as future leaders of Canada's military.

Officer cadets Gabriel Gagnon-Cady, Heather Mowers and William-Andrew Hotte check out the CH-148 Cyclone on display at 8 Wing Trenton on March 30.

Officer cadets Shania Gagne and Jonah Lisgo get a firsthand look at the CT-114 Tutor aircraft.

8 Wing member sets out on outdoor expedition in Nunavut

By Makala Chapman

By the time you're reading this, Major (Maj.) Kimberly Horan has already spent more than three days navigating the arctic tundra of Baffin Island. Taking temporary leave from her role as the deputy commanding officer of 8 Air Maintenance Squadron, the wife and mother is on a journey of a lifetime for the next two weeks. It was back in January that she first shared she had been accepted into Toronto-based organization True Patriot Love Foundation's (TPL) women's expedition to Baffin Island. As a little background, the charitable operation offers funding for programs aimed at aiding military families, current serving members and veterans from all across Canada. Throughout the years TPL has sponsored similar expeditions to places such as the Himalayas, Antarctica, and more. But what makes this trip especially unique is that it will be the organization's first expedition commandeered by an all-women's team. Amongst those braving the 100-kilometre trek above the Arctic Circle are servicewomen, veterans, business women and community leaders from all across the province. "It's going to be very cold and there's going to be a lot of snow," Maj. Horan explained prior to her trip. "We will experience a lot different of an environment than what we are used to here in Ontario. But, I haven't been to the Arctic yet and I've always wanted to go." When asked what she had done to prepare, she noted she partook in a few training camps to help familiarize herself with the equipment and to test her physical prowess. Leading up to the trip, Maj. Horan said she spent a lot of her time practicing her snowshoeing, dragging her children on a sled and even pulled a tire on a rope for a bit. "It is going to be very physically challenging," she said. "But the intent will be for all of us to learn to work as a team as we snow shoe across the environment. We will be sleeping outdoors and everything we bring we will have to carry on our backs or pull on a sled." As for why she wanted to be a part of this initiative, she noted there were multiple aspects. The first was to be a part of team looking to raise money, through sponsorship and donations, for those in need in the military community. The second reason, she noted, was a little more personal. Having served 20 years in the military, Maj. Horan shared that she has suffered both physical and mental injuries as a result of the job that still affect her to this day. "This is above and beyond anything I've ever done before," she said. "I haven't really been open about this but I do have PTSD from my military experience." On her TPL sponsorship page she further elaborates that despite these injuries, they don't stop her from being able to "lead a productive life and have a fulfilling career." She added she knows this is not something that all of her co-workers are able to say. In terms of what she hopes to get out of the trip, Maj. Horan said increased physical fitness, feeling of accomplishment and personal growth are certainly at the top of her list. Prior to leaving for Baffin Island, Maj. Horan was entrusted with an 8 Wing Trenton flag by Wing Chief Warrant Officer Troy Zuorro to take with her along the expedition. Those looking to contribute to Maj. Horan and her team's fundraising goal can visit her TPL sponsorship page online at truepatriotlove.akaraisin.com/pledge/Participant/Home.aspx?seid=17122&mid=9&pid=4678779.

Celebrating the 95th anniversary of the RCAF

By Makala Chapman

The Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF) is celebrating 95 years of professionalism, innovation and air power. As a tribute to both past and present members of the organization, a formal mess dinner was held at the National Defense Region and Deputy Combined/Joint Force Air Component Commander for 1 Canadian Air Division, Winnipeg, MB. Taking to the microphone, Brig.-Gen. Ireland said he was honoured to celebrate the RCAF's 95th anniversary with the men and women of 8 Wing Trenton and offered a toast to the air mobility community. "Not all of you are here as some of you are on missions around the globe and around Canada getting the job done and taking care of Canadians and allies," he said, holding up his glass. "Join me in a toast to our team-

Air Force Museum of Canada on March 28. On hand to welcome his members was 8 Wing commander Colonel (Col.) Mark Goulden. He noted reaching the milestone would not have been possible without the sacrifices of those before him and those that are currently dedicating their lives to service. Col. Goulden went on to explain that this year's anniversary was also the perfect opportunity to recognize the partnerships that have been integral to the RCAF's success over the years. He noted that the United States of America and their air force have been one of the RCAF's most cherished relationships. "This unique defence relationship extends back to the Second World War," he said. "We benefit from our close relationship with the United States and there's no military partnership stronger in the world. We share the effort to protect North America and fight beside each other around the world, providing security to those affected by oppression while guaranteeing our security in our continent." In recognition of that partnership, Col. Goulden invited special guest speaker, senior United States Air Force officer in Canada Brigadier-General (Brig.-Gen.) Christopher Ireland, to say a few words. Brig.-Gen. Ireland currently serves as the deputy commander of Canadian North American Aerospace De-mates." Brig.-Gen. Ireland then went on to share that 8 Wing should be proud of their role in the air mobility community as they were a lifeline for many. Going from helping transport materials and troops for missions to carrying out medical evacuations, he noted it was all necessary and greatly appreciated. "It's a team business," he said. "You should be exceptionally proud that you are out there with that flag on your shoulder representing your nation, your government, your military, your Air Force, your unit, your family and yourself." Speaking as an American working in Canada, Brig.-Gen. Ireland added that he couldn't be happier with the two nation's working relationship. He thanked the RCAF for always being there when his country has needed them and looked to their previous assistance during natural disasters as a prime example. "I've not been on an operation where I have not seen a Canadian in some capacity," he said. "Thanks also for trusting us to be a part of your defence of your country, your countrymen and women. It is indeed an honour for us." Following his speech, Col. Goulden and 8 Wing Chief Warrant Officer Troy Zuorro presented Brig.-Gen. Ireland with a framed photo of 8 Wing Trenton's memorial gate, which are located outside of Wing Headquarters, as well as a replica of the key that unlocks it. The gate was gifted to the RCAF in 1949 and officially dedicated in a royal ceremony in 1951. The memorial serves as a reminder of Canada's rich history serving alongside partners during the years of the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan. Brig.-Gen. Ireland was bestowed the gift as a token of the Wing's appreciation for his continued role in fostering a good US-Canada relation and taking part in their anniversary celebration.
